

New in Wynyard Quarter

Wynyard Quarter just keeps on getting better. In the last few weeks, the finishing touches have been put on a whole bunch of great new spaces to enjoy. You can now walk the entire way from Victoria Park to the waterfront along the Daldy Street linear park – a strip of green space wide enough to stop and relax in or enjoy a saunter through. The new grass is super lush and the trees provide some shade.

Daldy Street linear park above and the play area in Daldy Street linear park below

Amey Daldy Park is a new tree-filled field for lounging at the corner of Pakenham and Daldy Streets. It has rolling grassy knolls perfect for doing roly polys down the slopes if you're young or just young at heart.

Amey Daldy Park

There's more of Silo Park to love now too – with a new area created in time for the America's Cup. There is a new shaded structure, seating and plenty of flat areas. A great event space.

The new extension to Silo Park

The new structure, designed by Tessa Harris (Ngāi Tai ki Tāmaki), is called Te Nukuao - 'shelter'. It reflects the sails of waka hourua - large double-hulled ocean-going canoes - referring to the history of Wynyard Quarter as a 'water space' pre-reclamation and serving as a cultural marker for mana whenua.

If you look closely at the ground, you will also notice a constellation of stars sandblasted into the concrete. This design is by Reuben Kirkwood of Ngāi Tai ki Tāmaki, 'Te Waka o Te Rangi', references an ancient star map which resembles a great waka in the sky.

Te Nukuao at Silo Park

If you fancy an informative and scenic strolling tour of the new and not so new parts of Wynyard Quarter, take a look at the self-guided tour on the AKL City Tours app (Google Play here and Apple App Store here).